Summary: This document outlines the formal restructuring of the former Ukrainian territories into three distinct nation-states: Novo Russia, Western Ukraine, and the British-French Buffer Zone. Each of these states will maintain independent governance, security forces, and diplomatic representation while remaining within a shared economic zone until the year 2050. By this date, the integration of Eurasia into an AUKUS-led Anglo-Eurasian sphere will be complete, upholding the traditions of liberal world order and maritime-based sovereignty.

1. Territorial Division & Sovereignty

- Novo Russia: Encompassing the eastern regions, this state will serve as a strategic Eurasian gateway, aligning itself with economic and military structures that facilitate both security and resource management.
- Western Ukraine: Serving as a bridge between Central Europe and Eastern Eurasia, this entity will maintain an autonomous national identity, distinct language policies, and an independent governance framework.
- British-French Buffer Zone: This demilitarized zone will be established as a stabilizing force between European and Eurasian spheres, governed by joint Anglo-French oversight to ensure neutrality and security.

2. Economic Zone & Border Regulation

- A structured economic partnership will facilitate trade and movement while preserving national sovereignty.
- Formal border crossings will be established to ensure controlled migration, security screening, and the integrity of each nation's identity.
- Unified economic policies will promote stability and development while maintaining distinct fiscal and monetary policies per state.

3. Diplomatic & Military Considerations

- Each entity will establish its own United Nations delegation to foster diplomatic relations while remaining aligned with broader strategic goals.
- Military and police forces will operate independently under their respective governments, ensuring internal security and sovereignty.
- A gradual transition towards Eurasian unity under AUKUS leadership will be conducted through diplomatic, economic, and security agreements.

4. The AUKUS-Anglo-Eurasian Vision for 2050

- By 2050, the unification of Eurasia under a liberal, maritime-influenced world order will be realized.
 - The traditions of individual freedom, strategic military oversight, and economic interdependence will form the foundation of a new global paradigm.
 - The Anglo-Eurasian initiative will reinforce the supremacy of the free-thinking individual, protected by the strategic doctrines of Western military excellence.

Conclusion: This initiative embodies the long-standing traditions of maritime expansion, global trade, and military-colonial governance to ensure prosperity and security across the Eurasian continent. The new states, while independent, will contribute to the broader mission of global stability and the promotion of an enlightened world order based on the principles of freedom, agency, and strategic cooperation.
